Swiss House By FOVEA

FOVEA architects designed a prefabricated wooden house that combines privacy and generous open windows.

This house is described as a contradiction between the need for privacy and generous openings to the south. The 40 degrees inclined front of the stage creates a feeling of privacy along the terrace. In addition, it offers an introspective view above the garden.

The project reinterprets elements of this area's rural architecture. According to the press release, the proportions of the design are a call back to the typical tobacco barns built in open fields.
